Tag Archives: Utilitarianism Post navigation As I've already said, European style utilitarianism holds that the agent should maximize some 'utility' function of his or her pleasure and pain, given that other agents will be affected by that pleasure and pain. But what if the agent is a dictator? By that I mean a person who has the power to force other agents to do what he or she wants, for any reason or for no reason at all. Would such a dictator be obligated to maximize utility for the world? It's not hard to think of circumstances in which an agent would be willing to force another agent to have a specific level of pleasure or pain. Suppose you are in a job interview and you are told that if you don't take the job, your company won't be able to pay your salary and will have to shut down. Even though you want to be paid, you know that to get the job you would have to have the company pay you, even if it meant that some of your current employees would be out of work. Would you do it? Surely you wouldn't, and if such a situation would prevent you from acting in your own interest, then it would be wrong for you to take the job. (So perhaps you might be willing to risk giving someone less of a chance at a good job rather than to have the whole enterprise fail.) But what about cases in which it's the agent who is in pain? Suppose you are diagnosed with cancer and given a three-month life expectancy. Now, what if the only way to make sure that you don't suffer does

Here we investigated, in comparison with standard broth microdilution (BMD), the applications of the Sensititre YeastOne® YeastOne® Antifungal Resistance Microplate and Etest® methods in the assessment of antifungal susceptibility of Candida albicans against three antifungal agents, namely caspofungin, amphotericin B and fluconazole. For the first time, the pharmacokinetics of febantib, a novel fungal thrombin-like enzyme inhibitor with a potential application as antifungal, was also investigated in a murine model. The results indicated that the Sensititre YeastOne® method was the most efficient method for detecting drug resistance of C. albicans isolates against all three antifungals. Most importantly, the concentrations of antifungals required for the maximal killing in the YO-YO medium were comparable to those required to suppress growth in BMD.
