She shared with her colleagues at LibPower that she was born and raised in rural southwestern Virginia, and that she became pregnant at age 21. "I decided I didn't want to birth that baby and deliver it like that," she said. "I knew what it was like to labor." A friend of hers suggested that she talk to the doctor and made appointments with a hospital there. After delivering the baby, the doctor told Epps that her baby needed further care and suggested she transfer him to an OB/GYN clinic at a nearby state-run hospital. Epps soon found herself navigating unfamiliar territory, while also wondering why she had ever opened herself up to another doctor's care. "That was me, being naive and trusting all my life," she recalled. "It's that feeling." Epps said she was not offered any support as a trans woman during her birthing experience. She was told by the doctors that she had "failed" the baby, that he was "deformed" because he had a penis and had been pushed out of her body. He was whisked away and placed in a neonatal intensive care unit without any human contact, unless it was for a kiss from the nurses. When Epps returned home, she found herself lying about who she was. "I went through the motions," she said. "Because that's what you do when you're a trans person." When Epps and her wife decided to have their next child, she recalled, they "thought of them as females," raising their three biological children. They
