Tissue plasminogen activator (t-PA) and thrombin stimulate protein tyrosine phosphorylation in many cell types, including Xenopus oocytes, in a manner that is dependent on the number of phosphate residues present in the tyrosine phosphorylated proteins. One of these is Ca²⁺/calmodulin-dependent protein kinase II (CaMKII). t-PA stimulates Ca²⁺/calmodulin-dependent protein kinase II (CaMKII) in an autophosphorylating manner. This suggests that phosphotyrosine-containing substrates are involved. Our results show that phosphorylation of endogenous proteins by t-PA or thrombin is similarly dependent on the number of phosphate groups present, and that these endogenous proteins are the same proteins phosphorylated by tyrosine-specific protein kinases. The ability of t-PA to stimulate CaMKII supports the hypothesis that plasminogen activation may be an important mechanism for initiation of differentiation in several cell types.Q: How can I dynamically set the location of a Div?
