The present invention relates to a method for measuring the etch rate of a metal oxide layer, and more particularly to a method for measuring the etch rate of a metal oxide layer for an actual thickness measurement on a wafer. Due to the integration of devices in semiconductor devices, the fabrication of the semiconductor device, such as the chemical-mechanical polishing of the metal interconnection layer, the etching of the dielectric material layer, the CMP of the aluminum metal lines, and the critical dimension (CD) control of the micro-patterns, the measurement of the actual thickness during the fabrication of semiconductor devices becomes extremely important. Currently, existing methods for measuring the thickness of the aluminum metal or the metal oxide layer include: (1) measuring the length of the patterned metal layer, (2) using an optical microscopy to measure the thickness of a planar Al metal layer or an Al metal/dielectric stack, and (3) using a Scanning Electron Microscope (SEM) for measuring the thickness of the patterned metal layer. However, these methods have shortcomings. For example, in the measurement of the length of the patterned metal layer, the size of the patterned metal layer and the thickness of the dielectric layer typically vary from one measurement area to another. This is because the profile of the metal interconnection layer may be non-uniform and the uniformity of the metal interconnection layer is strongly dependent upon the profile of the metal interconnection layer. In addition, even for the same measurement area, the measurements cannot be conducted in real-time, since the planarization of the metal interconnection layer needs to be completed. Thus, although these existing methods can provide thickness information during the manufacturing process, these existing methods cannot provide in situ thickness information, and cannot provide thickness information in real time. Further, an accurate measurement of the thickness of the metal interconnection layer typically requires an extra metrology process (e.
