I have a variable $var that has a string "0". All of a sudden "0" was converted to "G" (0x1F). As a result I have a code that was meant to generate a http request that now does something else. As you can see here I need this to generate a http request because this is part of a system that gives easy access to the internet and for security reasons we cant use GET Any ideas why this is converted? Is it a php bug or a feature? Thanks. A: Since you are saying you need this to generate a http request, I'm going to assume you mean something like: $url = sprintf('', $var); If so, the problem is the content-type header of the HTTP request you are making is being interpreted by the HTTP server as text/plain which is text. All HTTP requests have headers, and there is usually a default one provided by the HTTP server. If you want to change the header, then you need to specify it in the request. This is normally done by setting the HTTP_ACCEPT header. You are going to need to specify the value as a MIME type and the value of the parameter in the query string. So, your call would look like: $url = sprintf('', $var, '-content-type', 'application/octet-stream'); See the documentation for details. 1,437.50 attorneys' fees, $300.00 in costs, and $92.50 in 2 This amount consists of (0.0) X$17,000.00 and (0.0) X$8,000.00.
